Plenary: The Politicization of Immigration

There is no doubt that immigration has been, and continues to be, a politicized issue, promoting polarized views, influencing support for political parties and leaders, and often positioned high on the political agenda. From Brexit to recent elections in a number of locations, current debate on immigration is a hot button issue, at times provoking increased support for anti-immigration, right-wing populism. What is at the core of this political attention to immigration, and what can be done to avoid extreme anti-immigration views in Canada? In this panel the presenters will analyze the mechanisms behind the politicization of immigration and provide an overview of current immigration debate in the Canadian context, including the role of the media, perceptions of threat, and determinants of shifting public opinion.

Plenary: The Role of Immigration in Canada's Labour Market

When we consider the future labour market of Canada, immigrants are often seen as essential for filling job vacancies, and strategies are sought for attracting, retaining, and fully utilizing the skills of immigrants. This session focuses on each of these aspects of the future labour market of Canada, with attention to the following questions: What will this labour market look like and what role is immigration likely to play? What strategies can we adopt to fully utilize the skills of immigrants and have them fill anticipated labour gaps? What role should employers play in the selection and full integration of immigrants? Are current strategies for the economic integration of immigrants enough or do we need new ways of looking at immigration to ensure that Canada and Canadians, both new Canadians and established Canadians, continue to thrive into the future?

Breakfast

8:30 AM to 9:30 AM

Special Keynote Speaker: Sharon Bala, Author of The Boat People

Arrivals: In August 1986 a group of asylum seekers were found floating in life boats, adrift off the coast of Newfoundland. Two decades later, 492 refugees arrived in a cargo ship that docked in British Columbia. Despite having fled the same civil war in Sri Lanka, the two groups were met with very different receptions. Comparing Canada's reactions to these maritime arrivals, and weaving in her own family's story, author Sharon Bala will explore the twin roles of timing and luck in our capricious refugee system and the two faces of nationalism.

9:30 AM to 10:30 AM

Plenary: Strategizing around Refugee Claimants – What Do We Know and What Can We Do?

In the last year, the discussion of increasing numbers of refugee claimants in Canada has been quite prominent, hitting the headlines of most major news outlets on a relatively regular basis. Yet the information we have been receiving from various sources tends to be a mix of real information and rhetoric designed to promote negative attitudes toward these claimants. In this session we will focus on sources and means for disseminating accurate information regarding refugee claimants to Canada, including past and expected future numbers of arrivals, our obligations to these individuals, and the process involved in handling their claims. We will also focus on strategies that may be utilized to humanely accommodate potentially larger numbers of arriving refugee claimants in the coming years.

Plenary: Settlement Challenges in Traditional and Non-Traditional Receiving Communities

With new immigration flows and increasing numbers of immigrants to Canada come new settlement challenges. These challenges may be experienced differently in smaller and larger communities, and in those communities that are new destinations for immigrants as well as those that are well-experienced in this regard. This session will highlight some of these modern economic, social, and civic-cultural settlement challenges, including those experienced in both traditional and non-traditional receiving communities. These communities have oftentimes developed innovative strategies for overcoming settlement barriers, and these strategies will also be discussed. Overall, a central focus will be on identifying the main settlement challenges for immigrants in Canada today and innovative strategies for addressing these challenges.
